Steph,

I have spoken to the above and (for the moment at least) persuaded her that because the CPS have advised on further action, then the best thing to do would be to await the completion of those enqs. Obviously in due course she could well be satisfied over some of the things she was originally saying we have not done.

I have also made it clear to her that she cannot complain about us not proceeding against her Sister in relation to the will business. I told her she can challenge that decision of course through legal means, but that decision in itself is not a matter against individual Officers, it is a Force decision based on legal advice.

For your info she did make it clear that she still intended to pursue a comp against you in respect of your attitude etc when speaking to her about this. (her words not mine)

The way it has been left is that I have agreed to re-contact her when the enq is complete so that she can decide what she wishes to pursue, and she will I assure you.

To that end could I ask you to advise me when the investigation into the death has been completed and obviously what the result is.

Many thanks

Pete.
